Event details

Dr Mark Harvey presents 'The Black Art of Taxonomy, or How Species are named', an often humorous insight into how a classification system is used to name organisms.

We all naturally use classification to give order and meaning to our life. Think of how we automatically group similar types into subgroups, i.e. we classify people into groupings of family, friends, workmates, neighbours, strangers etc. We use this same classification approach for effective management of records to give them meaning and context, to aid in their management and retrieval.

Taxonomy is the universal scientific discipline for understanding and classifying biological diversity, (biodiversity) which allows for a universal ready understanding of the species being discussed.

Who should attend?

- Records and Information managers and Archivists
- Records and information management officers
- Those who use classification systems in their work

Dr Harvey, an eminent scientist, is Senior Curator with the Western Australian Museum, and a commissioner of the International Commission on Zoological Nomenclature
